COMMON PATTERN

Why sensible couples still stay stuck

Most couples do not avoid money because they do not care. They avoid it because the conversation feels loaded, repetitive, or harder to start than either partner wants to admit.

The result is often a low-grade feeling of drift: you both mean to sort it out, but everyday life keeps getting there first.

01

The conversation keeps getting postponed

Money only comes up when there is stress, a deadline, or a small disagreement that suddenly carries more weight than it should.

02

The same tensions come round again

Spending, savings, debt, or house goals stay emotionally noisy because there is no shared structure holding the discussion together.

03

One or both partners feel mentally overloaded

Even when both people care, the planning and remembering can quietly fall onto one person, which creates more friction over time.

THE OFFER

What SteadyUs offers

A short, focused package built to help couples get clearer, more organised, and more aligned around money.

01

Two live sessions

One session brings the current picture into focus. The second turns that clarity into practical shared next steps.

CALM STRUCTURE

02

Simple prompts and follow-through

Between the calls, the process stays light and manageable, with enough structure to keep progress moving.

NO HOMEWORK OVERLOAD

03

Written summary and action plan

Couples leave with a practical recap of priorities, decisions, and what to keep doing next.

SHARED CLARITY

The goal is not a perfect financial life. It is a calmer shared process, clearer priorities, and a plan the couple can actually follow together.
